This book examines the representation of Habsburg emperors in late medieval and early modern European courts. It offers a fresh, comprehensive understanding of Habsburg representation that is grounded in the cultural, social, and political contexts in which it took place. The book analyzes the role of the emperor in the visual arts, manuscript illumination, and literary works, and it considers the ways in which Habsburg identity was constructed and maintained through these representations. The book also examines the relationship between Habsburg representation and the development of the Habsburg state, and it explores the ways in which the emperor's image was used to shape and reinforce the political and social order of the time. Overall, the book provides a new perspective on the role of the Habsburg emperor in late medieval and early modern Europe, and it challenges conventional approaches to the study of Habsburg representation.
